WELL, WELL, WELL! THAT'S A GOOD ONE! HAD ME SCARED FOR A MINUTE!

IT'S WONDERFUL TO HAVE SUCH A CLEVER BROTHER IN THE FAMILY!

DILLY, THE TOAD HEAD

FOR 10 years I've been standing here in the middle of Main and South Streets holding up traffic so the kids can cross the street to school, and in those 10 years as a cop I've seen plenty, and not all you expect, either. Take, for instance, the case of Hank Frisbee and Dilly, the Toad Head.

To start with, Dilly's folks were rich as blazes, and on the other hand, Hank came from across the tracks. Well, right there is usually the ending of a success story, because the poor kid always beats out the rich kid in the story books and everybody is happy. Well, if that's what you expect to hear from me, just stop reading right now, brother!

Two years ago Dilly's pop made Dilly go to Junior High School instead of sending him off to a private school like the rest of his friends did with their kids, so right away all the gang starts treating Dilly like an outsider because he had fancy clothes and all that. Especially Hank. That one guy did more to make Dilly uncomfortable than anyone else. People just sort of naturally expect rich kids to be smart and poor kids not so smart. That was a laugh. Hank, besides being big and good-looking and the captain of all the ball teams, was rated the number one mind in the building.

Dilly was so far down the list he was lost in the shuffle. But he was eager. He worked hard and studied hard according to his teachers, but he didn't get any place. He even tried out for a few teams and flopped. Which is what made his father so mad. That very large gentleman had graduated from college at the top of his class with a dozen varsity letters—and expected his son to do the same.

I was standing on the corner the time Dilly handed his pop his report card. He took one look at it and said, "No wonder they call you 'Toad Head'! You ought to be ashamed of yourself. And to think you want me to pay for your college education!"

Dilly replied weakly, "Aw, pop, I can't help it. Honest, I try awfully hard."

"It's no use arguing," his father exploded, "if you go to college it's because you dug up the money yourself. That's final. I don't think you're smart enough to get yourself arrested!"

Of course, who had to be listening in but Hank. He couldn't wait to pass the news around the school. Dilly tried to laugh it off, but Hank made it worse by reminding him that he had already been offered scholarships to some fine private schools on the strength of his athletic and academic prowess, and no doubt would get the same offers from a dozen different colleges when the time came. Dilly grinned and mentally agreed. Yes, Hank was quite the kid. Popular, smart, big, handsome and everything else. But even though he, Dilly, was the son of a wealthy father, he'd never get to realize his main ambition, going to college.

Well, this last spring news came around that the annual Soap Box Derby was to be held and the first prize was, as usual, a complete four-year college education. Practically every kid in school was all hopped up about it, but after a week or so of puttering around with home-made racers, their ambitions dwindled and they forgot about it. Not so Dilly. He saw one last straw and grasped for it, but when Hank wised up to what he was trying to do, he decided to beat Dilly out of it.

Every day after school the two haunted the wood-working shop trying to turn out their cars. Now Hank's father was a carpenter, and his oldest brother a metal worker, so by the end of the month, Hank had the sleekest looking thing on four wheels ever seen around school. He had made dozens of test runs before Dilly had completed his frame. Poor Dilly had a tough time of it. Never in his life had he used a saw before and he didn't know a wood plane from a golf club. No nail went in straight for him and he couldn't seem to get his bolts to stay on tight.

Occasionally, Dilly would slip Hank's flashy streamlined racer envious glances, but when he was finished, his looked like a junk heap next to Hank's. When he finally did get it on the road I had to laugh myself.

The races were held on the concrete stretch by Galloping Hills, and it was conceded that whoever won the preliminaries against the competition offered in this first race would be a sure thing for the finals. I wouldn't have missed them for the world. That day I seemed to be Dilly's only friend, for I was the only one to help him tow his car to the starting line. Unfortunately, on the way up I slipped and fell on his hood, tearing the whole thing apart. Dilly's eyes had tears in them, but he didn't cry. No, sir, he claimed that all that junk just got in the way anyhow and he proceeded to rip it all off and the rear end, too, until all he had left was a steering wheel, a plank for a body, and four wheels . . . just to make me feel good! Gosh, I felt like a heel instead!

Hank almost fell apart laughing when he saw Dilly's crate, so did the others. However, the starter got them lined up and waited for the wind to quit kicking up the dust before he gave them the flag. When it did go down all 12 cars were lost in a cloud of dust that swirled up the road.

I hopped in the car and drove like 60 down the dirt road alongside the course, hoping to catch a glimpse of the contestants, but all I could see was dust and the mixed colors of the cars. First one would be ahead then the other, and Hank was apparently leading the field, but nowhere did I see Dilly. The wind was so strong going up the hill that the cars weren't making good time at all. Hank's bright red car burst through the dust, the others trailing behind. I could have cried myself. Poor Dilly was lost in the muck.

Along the course the crowd would scream as the cars passed, but I couldn't hear who was leading until I neared the end of the first half-mile. They were shouting out the number of Hank's car! For a second I thought I saw Dilly, but I couldn't be sure. Too many waving arms were in the way. The last quarter-mile the dust came up in cloud-like puffs that all but blotted out everything, and the wind whistled like a thousand banshees.

I couldn't stand it any longer. I stepped on the gas and swung out around the crowd, then cut down the road to be at the finish line. I felt more like going straight home, but after losing the race for Dilly I had to stick around to tell him that it was a good try anyway.

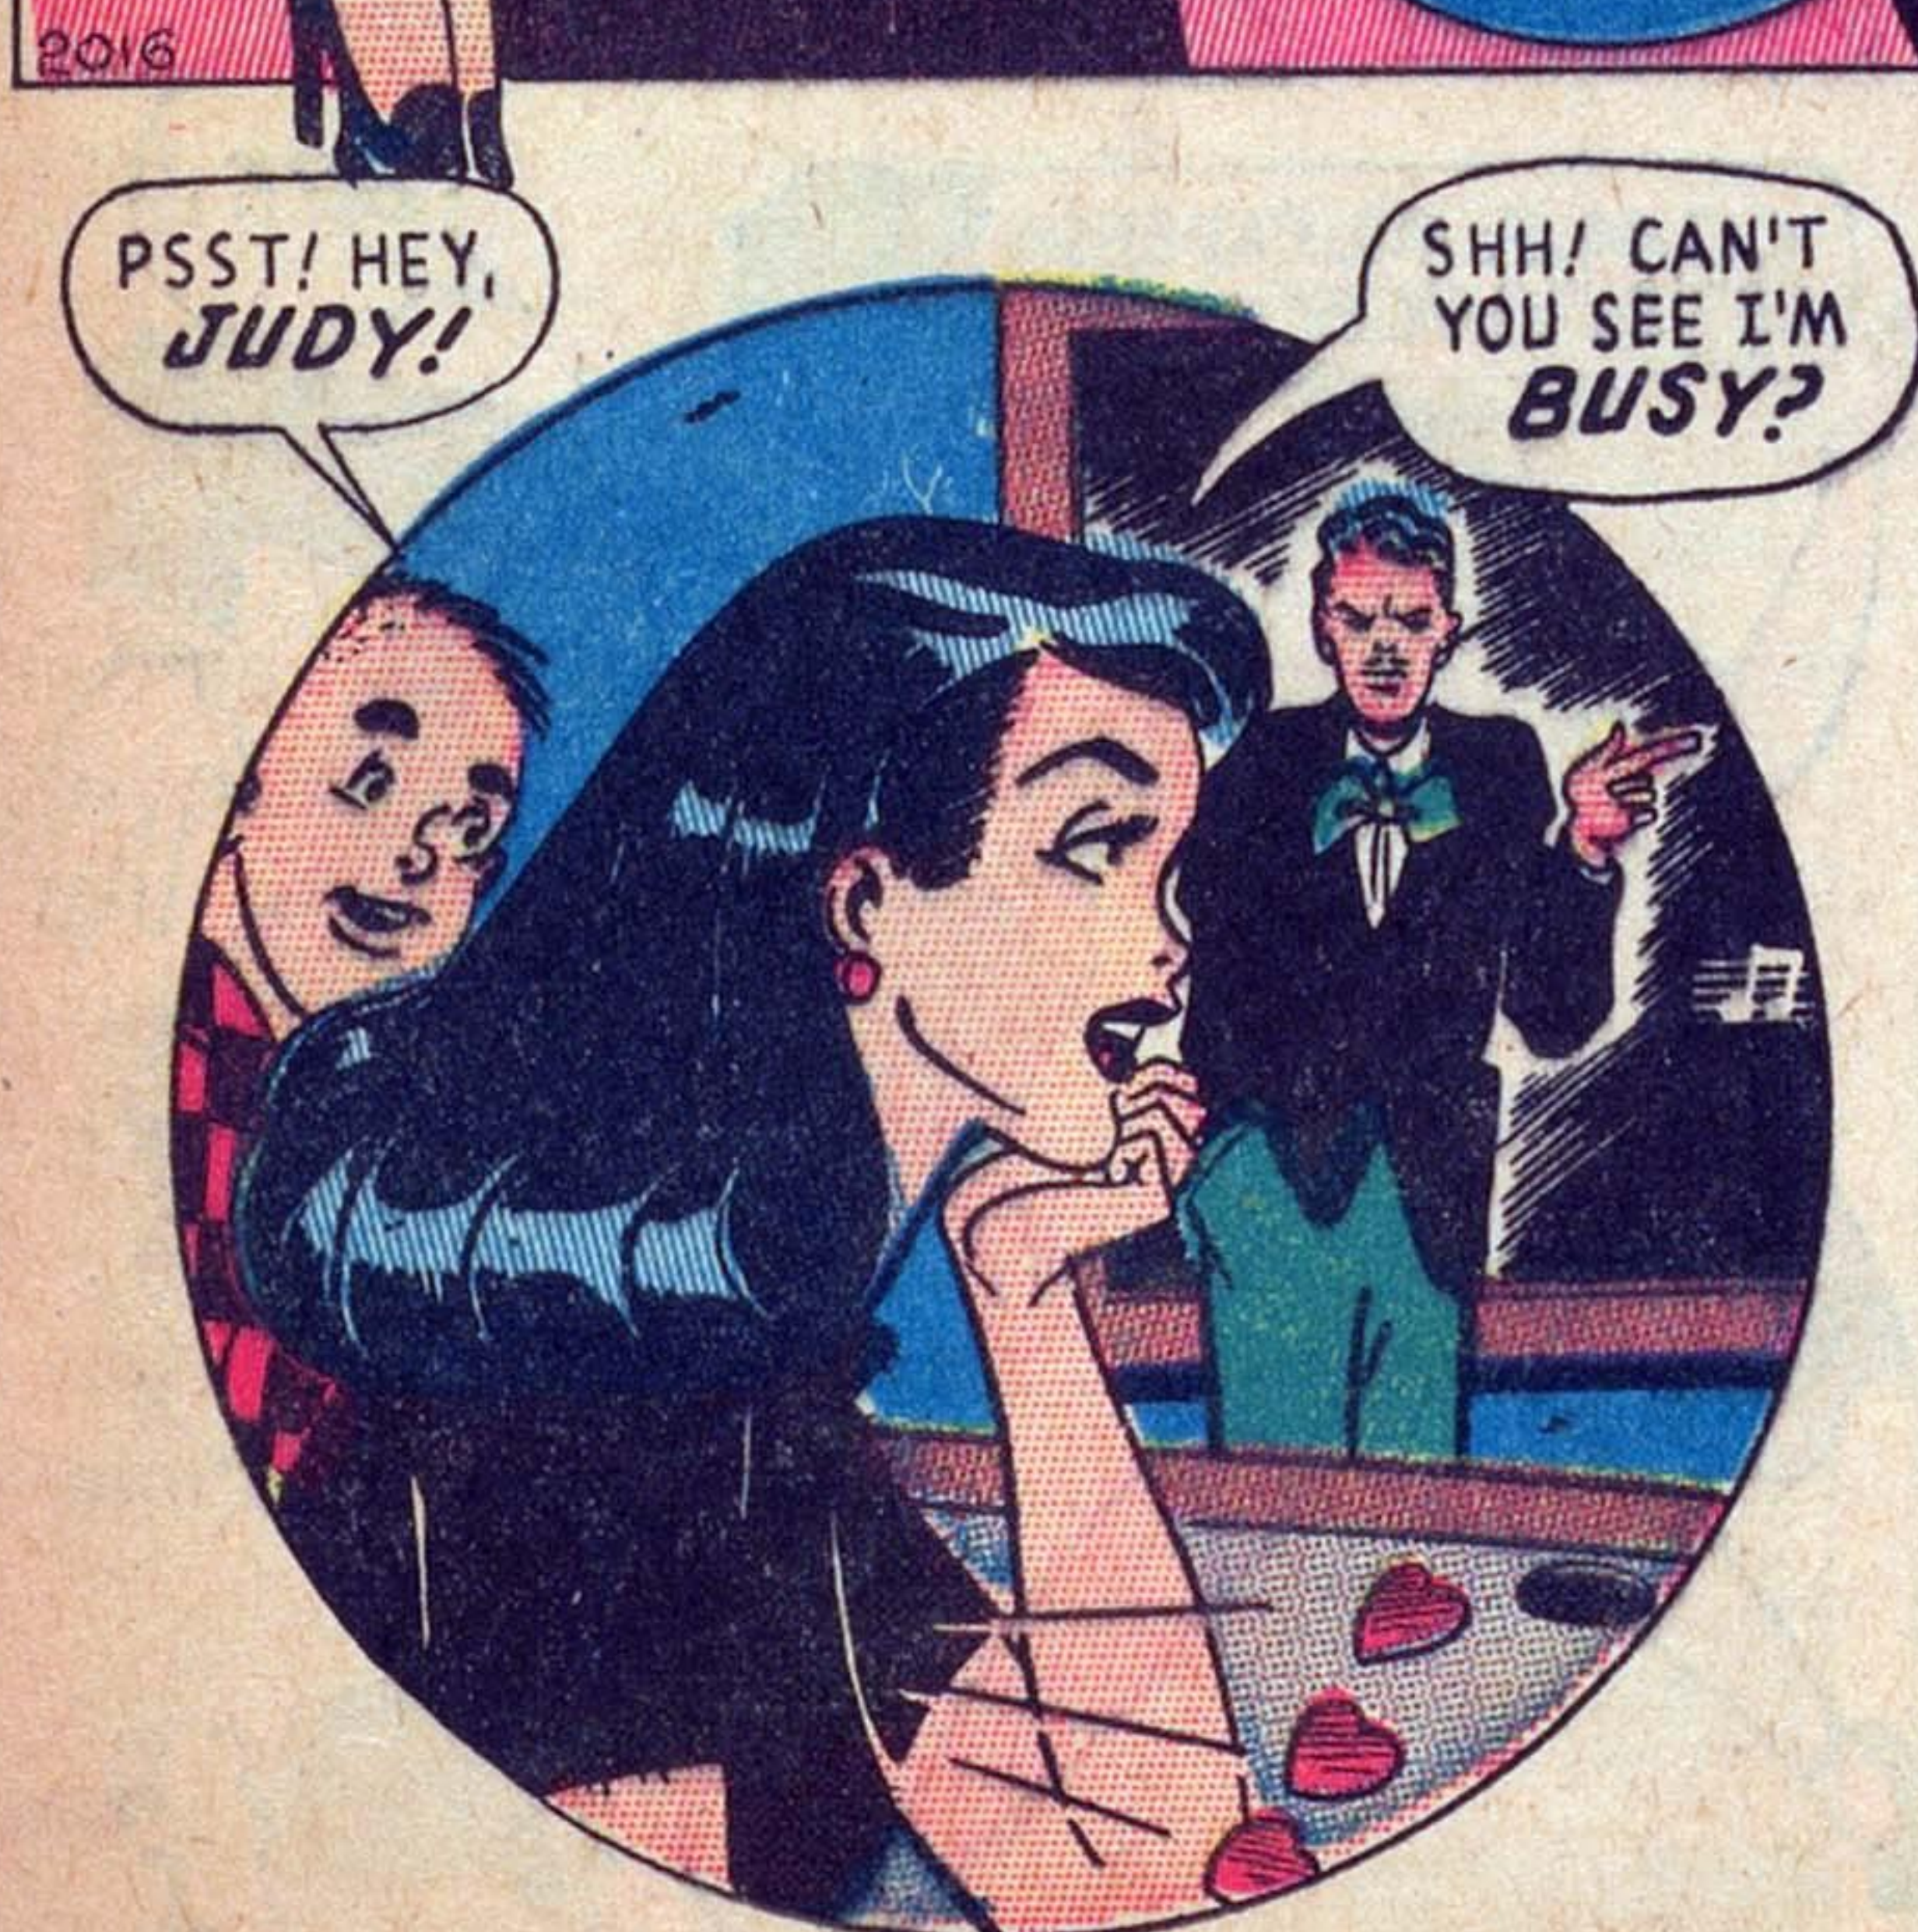

When I reached a place to park I cut the engine, jumped out and ran to a spot by the judge's stand . . . and as I did, someone let out a yell that could be heard a mile away, for at that instant the nose of a car cut the dust and skimmed over the finish line. Right then I almost fainted. It was Dilly!

I hugged him, I danced and petted the car like I had built it myself and the judges had a time dragging him away. The others came in barely moving against the headwind . . . and Hank was fifth! He just slunk away by himself.

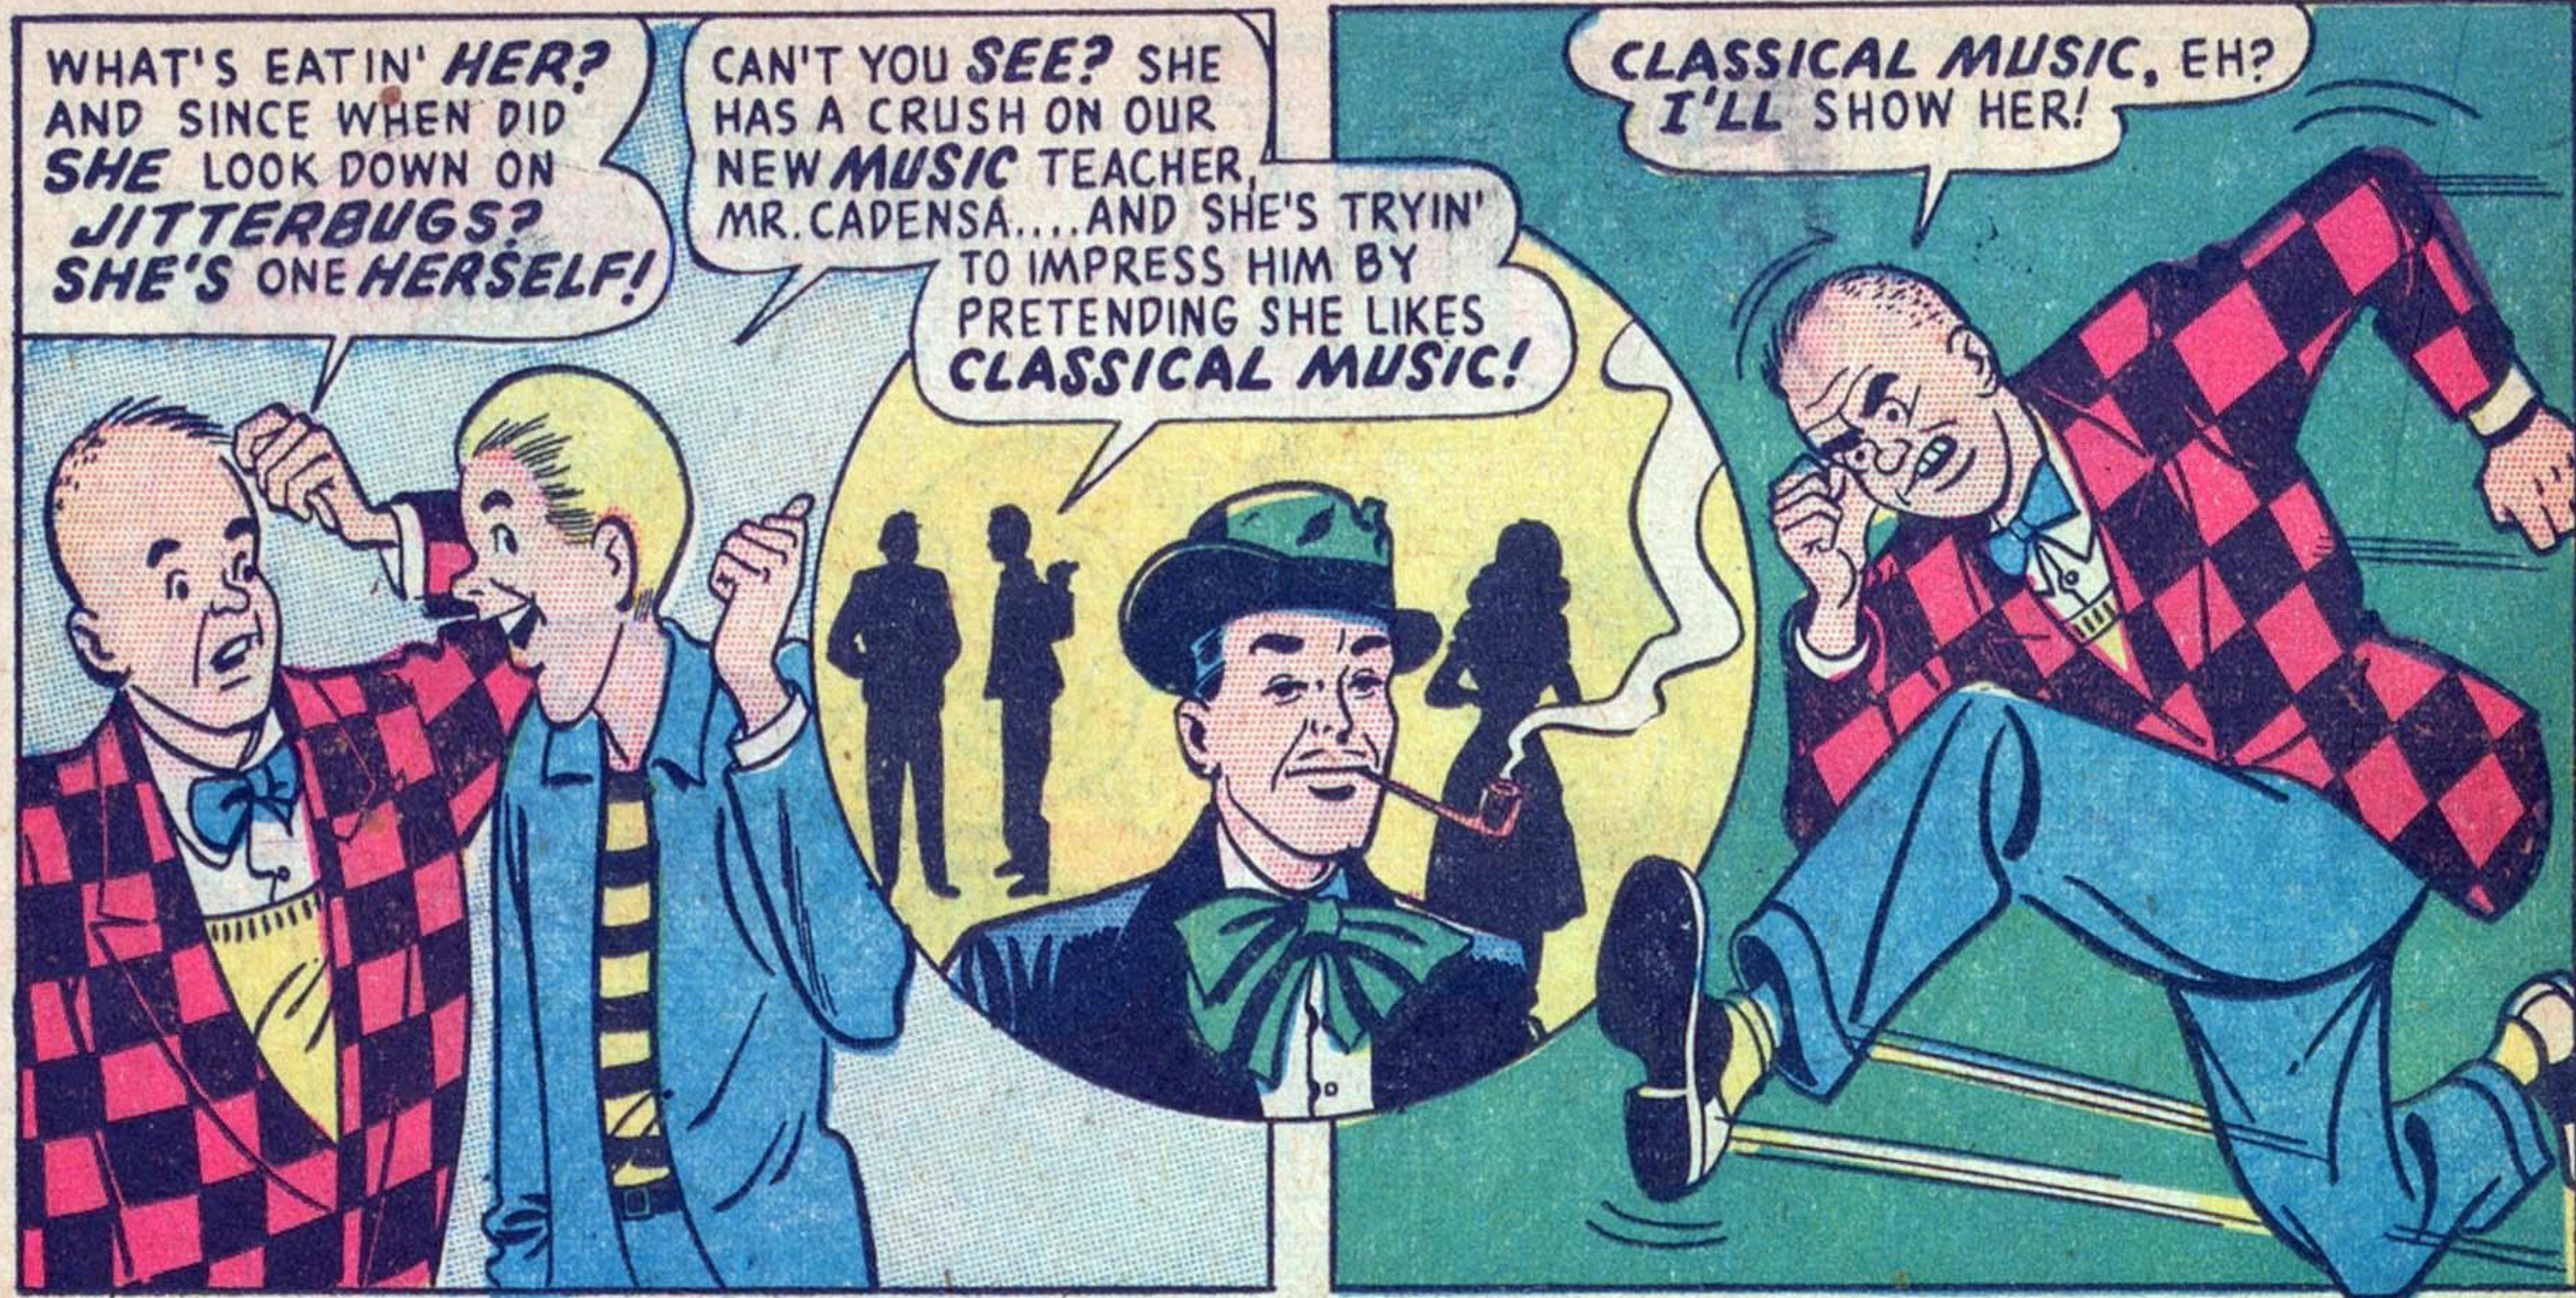

Yep, Dilly won the finals, all right, and he got to college anyway. The best. Hank was so unnerved after that he had a job managing to pass through school. You know, it wasn't until the other day Dilly told me why he won that race. It seemed that all the fancy streamlining on those other cars held them back. With his board on wheels Dilly didn't have a bit of trouble! Oh, yeah, Dilly's quite a guy now. He makes toy racers. Hank? Shucks, he works for Dilly driving a truck!
